dinner underground event.

"Whatever the venue speaks, that's what we go with," Abi said.

Preparations start in full force after the venue is secured and the theme has been set. Linens are ordered, centerpieces are decided and tables, chairs and lighting are set. Abi handles getting the venue ready and organizing reservations, and Manny takes on the menu.

On the day of the event, "all hell breaks loose," Abi says. They get to the venue early and finish setting the tables and getting the lighting ready. Then, Manny starts making the meal while Abi tends to any last minute details before the cocktail hour starts, usually at 7 p.m.

According to the Manny, the food is all made the day of, but much of the prep work — gathering ingredients, ordering supplies and anything else that can be done ahead — is done in advance so that it won't pull him away from the guests on the night of the event.

The meal itself, which is served family style, is based on the decided theme, but with a twist. Manny will look at the obvious choices for the theme and then add his own elements to the menu, "combining the classic and unfamiliar," he says.

"I don't want anything predictable," he said. "I want it to be pure. I love it when people say, 'I didn't know I liked this.'"

That feed back is the reason they keep planning these events, says Abi.

"We sit down at the table, and we become a family," Abi said. "When people take on the mood we tried to create, that's my favorite part."

"It's all about nourishment in two ways," Manny said. "First there is the actual food and drink. And then there's the spiritual — nourishing your soul. You're leaving with an experience you'll remember."

"When the last course has been served and no one is eating, but people are still there and comfortable, that's a job well done. The last course doesn't mean it's over."
